

Projects still get supplied

Given Roger Cook's fascination with vanity projects — racetracks, rugby teams and ferries, etc. — one can only assume that the declaration of a state of emergency is to ensure that there is plenty of fuel available to continue with the construction of the black tar project in Burswood and its associated environmental destruction. The fact that three out of six fuel companies treated Cook's letters with contempt comes as no surprise, as most of us feel the same way.
